Adam Learns to Spend Wisely

Adam is preparing to start university next year. He wants to study business, but he worries about the cost of tuition fees. His parents work hard to make ends meet, and Adam knows that their income cannot pay for everything. He decides to earn extra money during the summer holiday.

Adam gets a part-time job at a café. He receives wages every week and begins to put aside some money. His older sister gives him good advice: make a budget and avoid buying unnecessary things. She also tells him to look for a scholarship before applying for a student loan. Adam knows that borrowing money means paying it back.

One day, Adam visits a shopping centre to buy headphones. He sees two almost identical items. A famous brand costs an arm and a leg, while another one is much cheaper. A bright advertisement makes the expensive headphones look exciting. Adam remembers that marketing can influence the human brain, especially when people shop without thinking.

Instead of buying immediately, Adam reads product information and compares prices. He chooses the affordable headphones and keeps the rest of his money for university. His sister is pleased. Adam understands that consumers can make better decisions when they think about their needs, control their spending, and follow good advice.
