A New Path to a Career

At the start of her final year at university, Dana wanted to find a suitable job. She dreamed of working in medical technology, but she knew that a degree alone might not be enough. She studied job advertisements and discovered that employers often looked for communication, problem-solving and digital literacy. Dana decided to upgrade her skills before sending applications.

Dana joined a short online course and volunteered at a community health event. Her volunteer work taught her how to communicate with different people and stay calm when plans changed. She also completed a summer internship at a small medical equipment company. Her supervisor gave her useful feedback and encouraged her to include real examples of her accomplishments in her CV.

Later, Dana applied for three positions. One company offered a full-time office job, while another advertised a flexible role with some telecommuting. Dana compared the salary, working conditions and opportunities for promotion. The flexible position offered a slightly lower salary, but it would allow her to continue studying and spend less time travelling to work.

Dana was shortlisted for an interview. Instead of memorizing perfect answers, she prepared honest examples of how she had solved problems during her internship. She explained that her career goal was to keep learning and eventually lead a team. Even though she did not know whether she would be hired, Dana felt proud that she had approached her job search with a clear plan.
